The Causes of the Hundred Years' War

The Hundred Years' War began in 1337, when Edward III of England claimed the French throne. Edward was the grandson of Philip IV of France, and he argued that he had a legitimate claim to the throne through his mother, Isabella. However, the French nobility rejected Edward's claim, and they crowned Philip VI of Valois as king.

Edward was furious at being denied the French throne, and he began to prepare for war. He formed alliances with a number of German and Flemish princes, and he raised a large army. In 1339, Edward invaded France and began a campaign of conquest.

The Course of the War

The Hundred Years' War was a long and bloody conflict. It was fought on land and sea, and it involved a number of major battles. The English won some early victories, but the French eventually regained control of most of their territory. The war dragged on for decades, and it became increasingly brutal.

In the later stages of the war, the English began to use new tactics, such as the longbow. The longbow was a powerful weapon, and it gave the English a significant advantage in battle. The French eventually developed their own countermeasures, but the English longbow remained a major factor in the war until the end.

The Hundred Years' War ended in 1453 with the defeat of the English. The French had successfully defended their kingdom, and they had expelled the English from their territory. The war had a profound impact on both England and France, and it left a lasting legacy on the political and social landscape of Europe.
